

Why Photography Is the Best Art Form

I believe photography provides an experience unlike any other form of making art. You move your physical body through the world, explore, and use a tool that is accessible to all—a camera. The fact that anyone can make pictures, even with something as simple as an iPhone, is a powerful notion because photography is a democratic medium. It's an art form that welcomes everyone, without the need for years of training or specialized skills.

Photography is supreme because it is based on reality and accessible to all.

The Joy of Exploration

My first passion is to explore, whether with the camera or without. The camera is merely the excuse for me to continue moving my body through the world. Photography gives me deeper meaning in my life. This is why I believe photography is so great—it offers an opportunity to uplift humanity and provides a deeper understanding of the world through exploration.

Photography turns walking into a purpose.

It's more than just pressing the shutter; it's about engaging with your surroundings, feeling the air on your skin, and letting your eyes guide you.

Every step taken with a camera is a step closer to understanding life in all its forms. Photography allows you to wander with intention, transforming ordinary streets into pathways of discovery.

Pure Curiosity

With the camera, you're merely curious about what reality will manifest to be in a photograph. You point the camera at things that you find interesting or beautiful, and exclude the rest of the world outside of the frame. Photography is all about channeling your inner curiosity and focusing on the things that catch your eye.

A photograph is an instant sketch of life. It depicts what reality means to you and becomes a personal representation of your soul. The magic of photography lies in the ability to see something ordinary and recognize its potential to become extraordinary.

Here's why curiosity is essential in photography:

- It keeps you exploring new angles and perspectives.
- It drives you to ask questions about the world and its details.
- It allows you to find beauty in the unexpected.

What will reality manifest to be in a photograph?

This question guides every shot I take. It's the thrill of not knowing, of seeing what emerges when you press the shutter.

The Democratic Nature of Photography

Unlike ancient traditions like marble sculpture or oil painting, photography is a medium that requires no specialized training. This accessibility is what makes it so special. It means that anyone, regardless of background or skill level, can pick up a camera and create something meaningful. The bar to entry is low, and that's a good thing.

- Photography is inclusive: It welcomes all who are willing to explore and see the world through a lens.
- It's immediate: You don't need years of practice to start creating. A click, and you've captured a moment forever.

- It's ever-evolving: With new technology and digital tools, photography is constantly changing, keeping the art form dynamic.

In a world where so many forms of art are becoming increasingly niche, photography stands as a reminder that beauty can be found and shared by anyone.

The World of Dante

Photography, for me, is not just about creating images; it's about building a deeper connection with the world. It's about seeing the unseen and appreciating the fleeting moments that define our lives. Through photography, I find a sense of purpose, a reason to keep exploring, and a way to channel my curiosity.

A photograph is more than just an image; it's a way of saying, "This matters to me."

That's why I believe photography is the best art form. It's not just about the pictures themselves, but the process of making them—the act of seeing, the joy of discovery, and the thrill of capturing reality. Photography is my lens into the world, and I can't imagine life without it.
