

Photography Makes Life Infinitely Interesting

Photography makes life more interesting.

The mundane world isn't necessarily what it seems.

When I raise my camera to my eye and press the shutter, what I see in the photograph isn't necessarily what I thought I saw. What I get is often what I didn't see.

Natural Abstractions of Reality

The photographs I make are natural abstractions of reality — not how I imagine the world, but how the camera sees it.

Sometimes the things I find in my frames are mistakes.
But those mistakes offer me a surprise.

And those surprises are where the magic lives.

Behind the Veil

As much as I can see with my eyes, the things I find in my frames feel like they exist behind reality.

Behind the veil.

Something I'm trying to discover through seeking, through wondering, through asking questions while photographing.

That's the beauty of photography.

Curiosity Changes Everything

Life becomes infinitely fascinating when curiosity is cultivated.

Photography gives me a reason to stay curious — to stay open — to stay awake.

It's not about controlling what happens in the frame.

It's about allowing myself to be surprised by what reveals itself.

Follow Your Bliss

Follow your bliss.

Follow your love for life.

Photograph this — right here, right now — wherever you may be.

What you find in the frame might surprise you.

It might open your eyes wider.

And maybe, just maybe, it helps you recognize the beauty that already exists within the mundane nature of reality.
